Powers is a taffor and carned a good salary. On Easter Sunday he married Ella Dempsey, a hand-some girl of twenty-two. His conduct was brutal, some gir, or the some some gir, or their married life, and yesterday, tiring of ill-usage, she decided to leave him. She went to her father's home, and when Mr. Demosey and her brother John, eighteen years old, returned home from work she told them her tale. The father told her she could have her former place in his home and

The dishes had been cleared away and father and children were talking over the situation when their peace was disturbed by a violent knocking

"It's me. Bart." came back the answer, coupled with several curses and a demand that the door be with several curses and a demand that the door be opened forthwith. No one thought of calling for the police from the window, and suddenly with a crash the door gave way, and Powers with an eath bounded into the room, calling for his wife. She had taken refuge under a bed and the younger Dempsey has likewise fied. The old man stood his ground vallantly, and when Powers saw him he fourned on him like a madman. Levelling his revolver he fired it into the old man's face, not over a yard distant. Dempsey aropped without a groan, and the murderer, stooping over the bleeding form, fired three more shots.

"Take that, he growled, "and that," after each shot. "You won't medic any more." He then sturned and ran down the stairs, calling back to his wife:

"You had better get ready. I'm coming hear."

A policeman and a doctor were fetched then, but both were too late. No one knew which way the murderer had gone. For all that the police think they will have little trouble in finding him. His insane jealousy, they say, makes this threat to return and kill his wife plausible, and in hanging about to get a chance at her they hope to catchilla.
